

9 red flags to check on a wholesale supplier — before you pay.

The things we look at in the first ten minutes on every supplier. Tick each one you can rule out. Two or more left ticked? Check the supplier properly before the wire goes out.

1. Wire, Zelle or crypto only.

No card, no net terms, no trade-credit application. Money that can't come back, to a company you haven't checked.

2. "Authorized distributor" appears only on their own website.

Not on the brand's dealer or distributor pages, not in the brand's reseller list. The claim comes from the one party with a reason to make it.

3. Their distributor page names products that are years out of date.

A "PlayStation distributor" whose page only shows the 2013 PS4. Old product lines suggest an old relationship — or none.

4. The domain is new — or old with no proof it's the same operator.

A registration date proves when a website was made, not who runs it today.

5. The address is a virtual office, mailbox or home; the phone numbers don't match.

Different numbers on their site and in directories, an address that doesn't hold stock.

6. Prices well under the brand's normal channel, or "no MOQ" on a brand that gates hard.

Real distributors have floors. Deals that ignore them usually come from a route the brand didn't set up.

7. The brand publicly restricts online resale or warns buyers off unauthorised sources.

If the brand says it, the brand will act on it — usually as an IP complaint on your listing.

8. The "invoice" looks like a retail receipt.

No PO number, no ship-to, no per-unit pricing, no business address. A till receipt with a letterhead is still a till receipt.

9. They won't say who they buy from.

An authorised source can name its source. Silence is an answer.

Two or more flags? That's what the HyprriQ Supplier Report is for: one supplier, up to 5 brands, researched the way Amazon will — in your inbox within 10 hours. $79, one-time. report.hyprrx.com